Thank you.Q: Can I secure my data from being leaked if the software is leaked? I have a small 3D model that is encrypted, before I was storing the password to it on my local machine. I have now moved this to the server that I'm working on so that I can run it remotely and access it easily. I encrypt the file with AES-256 and store the key on the server so that it cannot be read easily. My question is, is it a good idea to keep the key with my source code on the server? Will the source code be made public if the server is compromised and the key stolen? Will that prevent the decrypted file from being accessed? A: Theoretically, you could send the key to the server, store it, and then have it removed. Then, even if the server is compromised and the key gets stolen, no one could use it. In practice, it's still a bad idea. Security through obscurity (encrypting your file with a secret key) is generally a bad idea. To avoid this, you would need to only use a key that has been widely tested and checked for security issues. It would be better to encrypt your data with the keys stored elsewhere. That way, even if the files get leaked, they would not be readable by anyone who didn't know the key. A: Having a key on the same server would probably be a bad idea, for two reasons: If you were compromised, the server would immediately be compromised as well, and no user data would be safe. If you were compromised and you ran an exploit that got into the kernel, you could get access to your server. If you had a secret on it, you could leak all of your data without further exploits. So, if you want your data to be safe, it should be on a server separate from your code. If you don't want it on a server separate from your code, encrypt the data before it leaves
