Say I have a colour stored in a NSImage. Is there a reliable way to get the colour for a pixel directly? Is there a reliable way to figure out what color an NSView's background is? These same questions apply to any colour-like thing - a colour in a font, a color in a fill, etc. A: N/A. You can't get the color of a pixel, that's why Photoshop is optimized for manipulating pixels and not color, and pretty much everything else uses color. Do you know your framebuffer's "color" property, and want it in pixels? No. Do you know the dimensions of the image? No. Do you know where in the image the pixel is? No. How would you do the calculation then? You might want to add a "color" property to the color that's stored in your image. If you want to calculate the color of the backgorund, there's an excellent WWDC video where a clever developer basically comes up with a function for doing that.
