The histological sections of 33 human thymuses obtained from patients with lung cancer were examined microscopically. Leukocytes were found in all thymuses. They were seen within the thymic parenchyma and were predominantly lymphocytes, but also included granulocytes, macrophages and plasma cells. Lymphocyte aggregates were frequently seen in the thymic cortex and cortico-medullary region of the thymus. Although the morphology of the lymphocytes was different from that of normal lymphocytes in the thymus, they may be involved in the host defence against cancer. Q: How to make sure the user has not messed with the default keymap or changed the setting to any other keymap? For example, he changed the value of something like Compose key or Windows key. My program should make sure the user has not messed with the default keymap and has not changed the setting to a different keymap. How can I make this happen? I was thinking about reading all the settings in the registry for the default keymap and the keymap the user wants to use. But I don't know where to start looking. A: It's not really trivial. You should check for the existence of any of the following keys:
