The ACT is creating an internal market for space data with the Government announcing today it is creating a single platform that will allow businesses to access private remote sensing data from anywhere in the world. A new action plan setting out how the Government will proceed with the establishment of the national space agency and the establishment of the Shared Space for Remote Sensing Data Act was also released this afternoon. The plan will also set out directions for the establishment of the public space agency and the establishment of the Office of the Minister for Defence - Space and Territories. "The plan will ensure a coordinated approach and approach for the development of the Australian space sector, beginning with the establishment of the new national space agency to foster and coordinate the space innovation sector," said Turnbull. Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull and new Minister for Defence Marise Payne. Photo: Alex Ellinghausen "By connecting geographically dispersed users from around the world, the shared space for remote sensing data could leverage Australia's expertise and expertise of its neighbours, particularly of the Asia-Pacific region. "The action plan will lead to greater demand for space-derived data services, greater investment in space capability, increased cooperation and collaboration, improved management of Australia's spatial capacity, and stronger relationships across industry, academia and government." Defence Minister Marise Payne said the action plan will ensure long-term stability of the space industry and create jobs. "The sector represents a significant contribution to the economy, and it will provide employment for many in remote areas of our country," said Ms Payne. "By making space data more widely available, businesses in all industries can compete in the global space market, boosting the economy. "The shared space plan will help to ensure long-term stability of the space sector, and ensure its innovation through the establishment of the new space agency." The new space agency's strategic plan will lay out
